One type of contribution that may be done is community development, which is a sort of knowledge transfer from academics through offering education and training to the community in order to develop their ability. Scholars can actively assist the community in the service area in using and developing the potential of existing natural resources and resources through this community service.

As part of its ongoing efforts, WUACD (World University Association for Community Development) Universitas Airlangga will host an international conference. The conference will offer a crucial platform for the growth of scholars and research on community developmental issues with a global perspective and a variety of skills and experiences. The program will be hosted by Universitas Airlangga and co-hosted by Universiti Putra Malaysia. It invites participants from both domestic and global networks to discuss in depth and effectively how academics around the world support each other in community development, particularly in environmental health.

THEM

"The Enhancement of Global Environmental Health for Sustainable Community Resilience"

THE OBJECTIVES

- Acting as a platform for the transfer of knowledge from scholars to society.
- Sharing and discussing the latest research in the aspects of environmental health sciences.
- Promoting international collaborative service and joint publication.
